

Search

CINEMA DAILY

About

News

A24's 'I Saw the TV Glow' Trailer Is Disturbing, Weird, Yet Enticing

The stylistic horror film stars actors Justice Smith and Brigitte Lundy-Paine. Photo courtesy of A24.

Ethan Le

February 28, 2024 2–3 minutes

a24, film, horror, i-saw-the-tv-glow, movies

A24 finally drops a creepy, unsettling yet stylistic trailer for “I Saw the TV Glow,” starring Justice Smith (“Pokémon Detective Pikachu,” “Dungeon and Dragons: Honors Among Thieves”) and Brigitte Lundy-Paine (“Atypical”).

With a disturbing remix of “Anthems for a Seventeen-Year-Old Girl” by Broken Social Scene, the trailer showcases an uneasy feeling that leaves a haunting thought as to what will happen next. Starting with a mysterious warning to a teenager having his head inside the TV, the trailer does not hold back on its fearful eccentricity that provokes a certain uncomfortability. Plus, the neon-eccentric imagery really adds a rich layer of style—a style that is well known to A24’s identity, that really captures the weirdness and horror-esque creativity.

“I Saw the TV Glow” trailer introduces Owen and Maddy, two teenagers who bond over a mysterious late-night TV show called “The Pink Opaque.” As the trailer goes on, the world around them becomes more fragile and chaotic as their obsession with the TV show grows. Coloring in a purple-ish tint of static haze, snippets of Owen’s reality begin to crumble as the line between real and fiction sinisterly blurs together.

There are many crazy visual elements that weave a coming-of-age story with physiological horror on many intriguing levels. Along with its full chilling story about TV obsession, “I Saw the TV Glow” might be this year’s best horror film. The cast also includes Ian Foreman, Fred Durst, Helena Howard, and last year’s breakout star Danielle Deadwyler, who gave a powerhouse performance in “Till.”

“I Saw the TV Glow” premiered at Sundance and holds a firm 91 percent on Rotten Tomatoes (as of Feb. 28), the critic’s general response has been universally positive. Helmed by Jane Schoenbrun, who previously made a splash at Sundance 2021 with her feature directorial debut “We’re All Going to the World’s Fair.” With a bigger budget, Schoenbrun seems to fully carry out an auteur vision in the form of purple-ish TV statics. Through her previous works, Schoenbrun’s personal touch is seen through her purposeful demand of the visual components, so rest assured, “I Saw the TV Glow” will deliver some mind-bending details that scream terror. The film is also being produced by Emma Stone, Oscar-nominated actress for “Poor Thing,” and Dave McCary, her husband, through their production company, Fruit Tree.

According to NJ.com, filming locations for “I Saw the TV Glow” were shot throughout the Garden State, including many places in Bergen, Passaic, Essex, and Morris counties—great places for gloomy suburban feel.

Tune in on May 3 for the theatrical premiere of “I Saw the TV Glow.” Catch the full trailer below:

I Saw The TV Glow | Official Trailer HD | A24

A24

Watch on